the execution of this arrangement by the capricious resistance of the cabinet of Washington."

It is not a little curious, in reading over the papers relating to this transaction, to see how some of the party journals of the day in the United States censured the minister for his in- thanks. terferance in foreign concerns; and foretold, very confidently, that he would be rebuked by the French government. And the London Times, of May 16, 1842, states, with apparent exultation, that the venerable patriot, who has just been called from among us. (Mr. Adams,) said in Congress that he regretted Gen.

"Should have so completely forgotten the wholesome rules of the founders of his country as to interfere, without instructions from his government, in a delicate negotiation between the great powers of Europe."

"It is unnecessary to push these considerations further; and in carrying them thus far, I have found the task an unpleasant one .-Nothing but instice to myself could have induced me to do it. I could not clearly explain my position here, without recapitulation. My protest of 13th February, distinctly asserted that the United States would resist the pretention of England to search our vessels. I avowed at the same time, that this was but my personal declaration, liable to be confirmed or disavowed by my government.-I now find a treaty has been concluded between Great Britain and the United States, which provides for the co-operation of the latter in efforts to abolish the slave trade, but which contains no renunciation by the former of the extraordinary pretensions, resulting, as she said, from the exigencies of these very efforts; and which pretension I felt it to be my duty to denounce to the French government. In all this, I presume to offer no furtder judgment than as I am personally affected by the course of the proceedings, and I feel they have placed me in a false position, whence I can escape but my returning home with the least possible delay. I trust, therefore, that the President will have felt no hesitation in granting me the permission which I asked for."
